Architecture and Preservation in Havana, Cuba
A Trip Sponsored Utah Heritage Foundation
April 3-9, 2016

Utah Heritage Foundation is pleased to announce its first program in celebration of the organization’s 50th Anniversary in 2016 – Architecture and Preservation in Havana, Cuba.

Cuba has often been referred to as a land lost in time. 1957 Chevys still cruise the streets and Havana neighborhoods display building representing over five centuries of rich heritage. The salt, humidity, and hurricanes have no doubt taken their toll on these architectural masterpieces, but time has made it more evident that the buildings are in need of serious repair. The Cuban government has been working diligently to rehabilitate these buildings, but it’s a massive undertaking that’s been made even more difficult due to the U.S. embargo.

Historic preservation has become a key strategy and innovative tool for the revitalization and sustainable economic development of distressed urban neighborhoods of Havana and rural areas in Cuba. These examples provide models for the revitalization and sustainable development of urban and rural areas in other economically challenged areas of the world, including the United States.

Friday, August 14, 2015 marked the grand reopening ceremony for the U.S. embassy in Havana. Progress in normalizing relations with Cuba is quickly being made and changes to the landscape are inevitable. Although only ninety miles of ocean separate us from Havana, it sometimes feels like we are worlds apart. However, we can find commonality with the Cuban people through our desire to preserve our architectural legacy. What will the progress between Washington, D.C. and Cuba mean for Havana’s 500 years of architectural history? The embargo has created hardship but it has also prevented modern urbanization that would have likely destroyed many buildings.

The Board of Trustees invites you to join Utah Heritage Foundation on a unique excursion to see firsthand the historic architecture and its preservation of Havana while experiencing the art, cuisine, music, and culture Cuba’s capital city on the precipice of change.

Background

Historic preservation has become the leading player for the revitalization of the local economy and urban neighborhoods in Cuba’s capital city, Havana. Here, the Office of the City Historian (Oficina del Historiador de la Cuidad de la Habana) has developed a comprehensive strategy to manage safeguarding the old city and adjacent areas.

Rather than accepting just a watchdog role, documenting heritage resources and encouraging the preservation of key threatened historic landmarks through advocacy and regulation (a common model for governmental preservation offices and nonprofit groups in the United States), the Office of the City Historian in Havana has moved through additional stages of organizational development and public influence since its founding in 1938.

After documenting important heritage sites and saving several of the city’s most endangered landmarks, in the early 1980s the Office of the City Historian commenced a fifteen year project to restore the 1778-1835 government house and palace, the Palacio de los Capitanes Generales. This building now serves as a museum, educational center and the organization’s headquarters.

In 1981, the Cuban government provided the Office of the City Historian with start-up funding to invest in the historic center of Havana. Through a series of five-year plans, key historic monuments, fortifications and several city squares have been restored following international preservation standards. Forty buildings were rehabilitated in the first ten years.

Many of these projects now generate revenues that are reinvested in new rehabilitation projects. Through several agreements with Cuba’s Council of Ministers, the Office of the City Historian was granted special legal powers to promote sustainable development within a priority zone for preservation in Havana by developing relations with national and foreign entities, entering into economic partnerships, and charging taxes on productive companies to fund rehabilitation.

This, coupled with the declaration of the Historic Center of the City of Havana as a World Heritage site by UNESCO in 1982 and the severe economic consequences of the fall of the European socialist block, helped to propel the Office of the City Historian into taking a leading role in the rehabilitation and sustainable development of the city.

Many neighborhoods are extremely overcrowded and even basic services like running water are lacking due to the severely deteriorated public infrastructure. The rehabilitation work has not been limited to the redevelopment of old buildings, but has also supported the social needs of inhabitants of Old Havana and the surrounding areas of the city.

The Office of the City Historian also supports schooling, social, cultural and recreational services with a staff of trained educators, psychologists and health care workers. Their top priorities include satisfying the needs of the most vulnerable social groups and to improve the quality of housing as well as provide cultural and recreational services for the neighborhood residents. Their preservation projects in Old Havana include the rehabilitation of historic churches into concert halls, the establishment of a public library and music conservatory, and an old person’s residence and senior citizens hotel. Grandparents clubs have been organized by hospitals in the area to help provide senior citizens with daily attention and activities. A maternal-infant center and a care facility for children with degenerative illnesses such as Downs Syndrome have been established in rehabilitated older buildings. The Office of the City Historian also provides cultural programming for children and teens in the arts, dance, theatre, patrimony, literature and ecology.

To avoid negative impacts of gentrification, neighborhood residents are involved in the process of planning and working on projects. A central goal is to minimize the displacement of residents from neighborhoods. The city historian’s office runs a workshop school for young people between 18 and 21 years of age, training several hundred of them over the past ten years to become qualified to work as masons, carpenters, painters, plumbers, electricians, and gardeners involved in the preservation and restoration of historic buildings. On graduation from this restoration trades school, students have the opportunity to work for one of the two construction companies established by the Office of the City Historian.

The evidence of the level of investment in preservation is obvious as one walks through Old Havana and the adjacent neighborhoods. Many of the key landmark buildings surrounding the main squares have been rehabilitated to provide housing, offices, tourist facilities and social services while new water lines and street lighting were installed across Old Havana and in the San Isidro and Malecon neighborhoods.
A RECOMMENDATION
The Georgia Trust for Historic Preservation recently traveled to Havana with WorldGuest and we were absolutely delighted with the experience. The itinerary was custom designed for our group and we had several highly informative lecturers speak to us to bring key insight and expand our appreciation of Cuban art and architecture. The travel details were handled very well and I would highly recommend WorldGuest to my colleagues.
